Mixing Religion With Politics and Business.

We have all heard preachers condemned because they discussed in the pulpit the every day affairs of life; because they talked about living things, present day issues; told us how we should conduct ourselves in our business relations; spoke of political matters and denounced the acts and policies of men in public life. Each one of us at sometime or other has heard an expression similar to the following: "Why does he not preach the gospel, instead of saturday evenings, while these special interferring with things that are none of his affairs. Politics and business should be kept out of the church."

In one of the most forceful and logical sermons it has ever been our pleasure to read Dr. Washington Gladden, of Columbus, discusses the relationship of religion to business and politics. Among many other good things, he says, "Separate religion from life, from public life, social life, business life, the life of the communitymake it a mere theology or a mere subjective experience or a mere ritualistic cult, and it grows sour and bitter and rancid; it becomes Phariseeism or orthodoxism or fanaticism or superstition. On the other hand, if it is kept in constant and vitalizing touch with the life of the people it is kept pure and rational and fruitful of good guest of her sister, Mrs. Evans and works. The only way to keep our own religion sane and vital is to make it a power in the life of the community and the nation. The tendency is just as strong today as it was 25 centuries ago to separate religion from life. Perhaps there are as many people today as there were in the days of Amos who think that the attempt to bring the Christian law to bear on trade and business, on city politics and her son, Dr. J. A. B. Srofe and family. national problems is a profanity of the pulpit and a desecration of the Sabbath.'

The truth of the above statements are self evident. If a religion is to mean anything, it must be a part of the every day life of former's sister, Mrs. F. T. Pavey and a people, it must effect their every relationship and it must influence | Tamily. every department of life. If it does not do this it is a mere form and worthless

In our opinion the preacher who does not bring politics and business into the pulpit is not preaching the religion of Jesus Christ. Politics and business more vitally effect the happiness and wellfare where a delicious turkey dinner was of everyone than anything else and what is a religion for if it does not deal with the things that make or mar our happiness and well being.

To the man who takes an opposite position from this, we have only one request to make and that is that he study the Bible. We will not refer him to any particular book. He may open it at random, either the Old or New Testament, and he will find that religion part of the past week with her broth- Lizzie McLaughlin and other relatives was in the days of the Bible, a religion touching every phase of er, Lewis Huff and wife. life and no where so closely as in the teachings of Christ. Politics, business, social affairs, the intimate things of life were almost without exception his themes. To make plain his teachings he took the things most familiar to his hearers.

You have often heard it said that it does not do to mix religion | E Sunday school last Sunday. with politics or business. It is not a question of mixing them. You can not separate the Christian religion from politics and business. Every true Christian carries his religion everywhere. He can not put it on or off as he may desire. Christ mixed his religion with politics, with business, with everything and it is impossible F. E. Gossett and wife, at Frogtown, for his followers to separate them. If you come home early you can slam the door and knock over two or three chairs and no one will hear you or if they do the clock won't strike for an hour. But if you come in late, even if the hinges and lock are freshly oiled and work without a sound and the door is closed gently and not a board squeaks and you do not touch a thing, every member in the family hears you and every clock in the house strikes the next minute.

SINGING TO A PHONOGRAPH.

One of the Most Trying Ordeals in an

Specially constructed violins, cellos tubus, drums and reed instruments grand opera singer when be or she essays to waft the voice upon a phonograph record. And it is safe to say this singing to the phonograph is the most trying ordeal in the artist's ca-

Singers like Caruso, Melba. Farrar, Amato and a host of others are united in declaring the singing for records the hardest work they ever have undertaken. They are bereft of their audiences that inspire confidence, and they necessarily must be careful to avoid false notes or inflections. The slightest clearing of the throat or the muffled shuffling of feet will spoil a record. And then it all has to be done over again.

The singer is ushered into a great barnlike room, curtained off at one end. Through this curtain protrudes a gigantic brass born, suspended from the celling. It is attached to the phonograph record.

It is then the singer notices a bevy of musicians, but with instruments the like of which he never has seen in any theater. The violins are of different shapes from the instruments with which he is familiar. The horns are of varied shapes, and to each is attached a little funnel that points in the direction of the large receiving horn. This is to concentrate the sound The conductor sits on a platform high above his musicians and the singer. Thus he offers no obstruction to the free transmission of the sound waves. The singer is stationed upon a platform and close to the mouth of the born

A red light flashes, the musicians pour forth light, soft melody, for which their instruments are particujarly designed, and the grand opera artist loosens his vocal cords. His tone must be steady and strong. The slightest variation is recorded upon the wax record, and a trivial noise may spoil the performance Once be has finished, the record is placed upon a producing machine and played over to detect faults. These errors are pointed out and the singer rehearsed to prevent them Again he repeats the song, and perhaps a dozen times be is forced to sing before a perfect wax impression is obtained

Great grand opera artists are paid thousands of dollars for a series of records, and the sale of these brings millions to the manufacturers.-Indianapolls Star

Dueling Prime Ministers. In the old days a number of British premiers figured on the dueling ground.
